As a homeowner you are responsible for the maintenance of your propane gas service line (both above and below ground). Over time, unpreventable conditions may cause your gas line to deteriorate or crack and once repaired, you could find yourself with an expensive bill that's not usually covered by homeowner's insurance.

WHAT CAN CAUSE YOUR GAS LINE TO BREAK?

Above Ground: Weather conditions, accidental damage, animals, falling debris.

Below Ground: Age of line, temperature changes, ground shifting, soil conditions, tree roots, pipe material, accidental damage, improper back fill of tank allowing water to collect inside valve assembly.

As of 2011, the National Fire Protection Association requires that all underground propane tanks be tested to ensure they meet new corrosion protection standards by utilizing 17 lb. sacrificial magnesium anode for each 500 gallon sized propane storage tank. A 1000 gallon tank requires 2 anodes for adequate protection and must be tested periodically to meet Federal Standards.
